A FREE EDUCATIONAL GUIDE

Finding Your Ground

A gentle guide to acculturation stress

Living between cultures can bring possibility, connection, uncertainty, and loss. You may feel grateful for new opportunities and miss home deeply. Both experiences can belong in the same story.

This short guide offers language for what you may be experiencing, small ways to support yourself, and questions to explore at your own pace.

You do not have to leave your culture behind to make room for a new chapter.

Prepared for individuals, immigrants, and bicultural families by
Erica A. Rentz, MA, LPC, LMHC, NCC
Argon Counseling & Evaluations, LLC

Inside: Understanding cultural adjustment; recognizing stress; finding everyday support; navigating relationships; and reflecting on your next step.

For education and reflection. This guide does not provide a diagnosis or replace individualized mental health care.

What is acculturation stress?

Acculturation is the process of navigating contact between cultures. Acculturation stress is the strain that can arise as you adjust to different languages, expectations, values, and ways of living.

It may involve learning unfamiliar systems, feeling misunderstood, changing family roles, or missing the ease of expressing yourself in your first language. Discrimination, financial pressure, family separation, and immigration uncertainty can add to the burden. [1, 2]

There is no single adjustment timeline. Experiences vary with circumstances, resources, relationships, and the welcome people receive. Stress can return around major transitions, even after years in a new country.

Adjustment does not mean erasing yourself. You can keep meaningful traditions while choosing new practices that fit your life. Your relationship with each culture may change over time.

A moment to reflect
What feels unfamiliar right now?
What do I miss that others may not see?
Which parts of my culture help me feel like myself?

Remember: Barriers such as discrimination or lack of language access are not personal failures. Support may need to include practical resources as well as emotional care.

How stress may show up

You may notice worry, sadness, loneliness, frustration, irritability, difficulty concentrating, or feeling caught between expectations. Stress may also accompany disrupted sleep, muscle tension, tiredness, or changes in appetite. These experiences can have many causes; they do not establish a diagnosis.

Everyday moments can take extra effort. A phone call, school meeting, or appointment may require translating words, reading unfamiliar social cues, and worrying about being judged.

Mixed feelings make sense. You may love your new community and still grieve people, routines, professional identity, or a sense of belonging you once knew.

Try a gentle check-in
What happened just before I felt overwhelmed?
What thoughts, feelings, or physical sensations do I notice?
Do I need rest, clearer information, connection, or practical help?

If noticing body sensations feels uncomfortable, keep your attention outside yourself instead: look around the room, notice a familiar object, or listen to a sound you find neutral. You can stop any exercise.

When symptoms are new, persistent, or concerning, speak with a health professional. Do not assume every physical symptom comes from stress.

Make room for support

1. Keep one familiar anchor.
A meal, song, language, faith practice, or family tradition can create continuity. Choose what feels supportive to you.

2. Reduce one practical burden.
Write down questions before an appointment. Ask whether interpretation or translated materials are available. Break unfamiliar tasks into smaller steps.

3. Build connection gradually.
Consider a trusted friend, cultural organization, community group, or other welcoming space. Support and belonging matter, but no single group has to meet every need. [1, 2]

4. Offer your body a pause.
If comfortable, feel the chair supporting you, look around, and notice three things you can see. Let your breathing stay natural. A brief pause is an option, not a requirement.

5. Protect basic routines where possible.
Make room for regular meals, rest, and movement that suits your abilities and circumstances. Begin with one manageable change.

6. Choose information boundaries.
Notice how news or social media affects you. Consider a specific time to check reliable updates rather than checking throughout the day.

This week, my small step will be:

_____

Two cultures, many meanings

Partners and family members may adapt at different speeds. Expectations about closeness, parenting, independence, money, and family responsibilities can differ. A disagreement may involve personal preferences, cultural meanings, or both.

Replace assumptions with curiosity.
Try: "What does this mean to you?" or "How was this handled in your family?" Describe your own experience without making one person represent an entire culture.

Make space for language.
Some feelings are easier to name in one language. Ask for time to find words, explain a phrase, or return to a conversation after a pause.

Speak about the need underneath.
Instead of "You never understand," try "I miss feeling connected to home, and I would like us to make time for that together."

Create shared practices.
Choose a tradition from each background, or create something new together. Compromise does not require giving up every part of your identity.

Reflect together, if it feels safe:
What helps each of us feel respected?
Which traditions do we want to carry forward?
Where do we need clearer boundaries or more support?

If conversations involve fear, threats, or coercion, prioritize personal safety and seek individual support rather than relying on joint communication exercises.

You deserve room for your story

Consider counseling when distress persists, feels overwhelming, or interferes with sleep, relationships, work, or daily life. You do not need to wait until you reach a crisis to ask for support.

A culturally responsive counselor can explore your experiences without treating your background as a problem to fix. You can ask about language options, experience with migration and bicultural relationships, confidentiality, fees, and availability.

My next step

One strength I bring: _____

One person or resource I can contact: _____

One question I want to ask: _____

Connect with Argon Counseling & Evaluations, LLC

470-588-5469

info@argoncounseling.com

www.argoncounseling.com

Services available in English, Spanish, and Portuguese.

Georgia and Florida; availability depends on your location and service needs.

Use general email for scheduling and basic questions. Ask how to share sensitive information securely.

Sources and further reading

[1] World Health Organization. (2023). Mental health of refugees and migrants: risk and protective factors and access to care.

Read the WHO report

[2] American Psychological Association. Immigration and refugees.

Read APA resources

The reflection prompts and suggested exercises are original educational content, not a validated assessment.